The gender ministry has joined Kampala capital city Authority (KCCA) to enforce a law prohibiting individuals from giving money to street children.

Youth and children affairs state minister Florence Nakiwala announced that the ministry would be part of inter – agency team comprising several other ministries and agencies implementing the ordinance.

The KCCA child protection ordinance 2019, drafted by KCCA is also intended to protect children in Kampala from engaging in harmful activities such as selling alcohol, which are not covered by the current legislation.

Once passed into law anybody found engaging street children – in harmful employment would be imprisoned for six months or pay a fine of 40,000 thousand shillings. If we embark on this it will be hard for these children to survive on the streets, otherwise giving them handouts will only encourage them to keep on the streets. Nakiwala said.

The minister made the remarks while launching an operation to resettle street children that started yesterday, at two rehabilitation sites in Kampala and Wakiso districts.

The number of children on streets stands at 15,000 according to records from the gender ministry. Nakiwala however told journalists that the gender ministry in partnership with the ministry of internal affairs and KCCA have been able to withdraw, rehabilitate and resettle up to 8,070 children in the past operations.

This exercise had not been consistent so the number of children on the streets has kept increasing whenever there is a break in the exercise.
